

Those Who Do Not Remember the Past

None other than the late Milton Friedman formalized this relationship with his permanent income model of spending. In a nutshell, this model says that permanent spending depends on permanent income. In other words, people use saving and dissaving (including, perhaps, going into debt) to smooth temporary changes in their income and maintain relatively level spending. People try to stick to their chosen lifestyle.